

Sixth Form sociologists think about the General Election

Lower 6 are currently studying educational policies. Having written their own policies for the perfect education system it is a very good time to consider what the main political parties may choose to do with the education system in this country if they come to power. They researched the Conservative, Labour and Liberal Democrat possible education policies and presented these to the rest of the group. This created some interesting discussions about studying maths until age 18 and the place of military service.

Our sociologists were able to link the policy ideas to key concepts we have considered throughout this year. As the voters of the future this was a really useful exercise and a good introduction to getting them to engage with the campaigns leading up to the General Election.
