

Lower 6 sociologists create their own educational policies

Our Lower 6 sociologists have begun their final education topic which is about educational policies. They acted as policy makers for a day, imagining they were different types of sociologists designing our education system. They had to think about what education might look like if it was designed by Functionalists, Marxists or Feminists. They came up with some really interesting ideas about admissions, school uniform, curriculum and management structures. This was the first time they have been asked to present to the group and I was so impressed with their quality of their knowledge and their confident presentations. Perhaps we will see them all working in the Department of Education in the future!
